TYPEFACE ANALOGUE

It is a fact of life that typeface designs can change from one manufacturer to another. Design adaptations have always been present in the typographic industry. Faces originally cut for handset type were adapted for metal typecasters. Then further adaptations were necessary to convert a face for use on various phototypesetters.

Through each generation the typeface can, and usually does, have design changes. This means that typefaces as they were originally conceived and drawn are not what we are using and specifying today. Major manufacturers devote much time and expense creating accurate versions of popular type styles for their customers, and, in many cases, give these completed designs new names.

This reference guide has been compiled by typographic professionals to make it easier for typographers, typesetters and graphic designers to specify type. The most complete and accurate list of its kind, this guide offers a convenient cross-reference of the most used and/or confused typeface names. When a particular typeface name can be linked to a line of phototypesetting equipment the manufacturer of that equipment is indicated. Type styles that are available from virtually all manufacturers by the same name, such as ITC Benguiat, are omitted. Type styles that are generally available from only one manufacturer, such as Compugraphic's Holland Seminar, are also omitted.

Armed with this guide, the type user can successfully determine and alphabetically find cross-references for the various names given to a particular type style.
